

Miller & Rhoads.

Miller & Rhoads.

A SPECIAL SALE Of American Cut Glass.

The value of Cut Glass depends, as you know, on the size of the piece and the amount of cutting.

Compare the articles we offer this morning with similar articles—some of them in our own stocks—and note the difference in prices. We bought a number of fine Cut Glass pieces a couple of weeks ago much underprice. They reached Richmond on Monday and the "Special" Sale means they go out at lower figures than we can offer to sell regular stocks.

A 7 inch preserve dish that would be a good value at five dollars we offer for $2.25.

The cutting is very deep and the pattern rich.

A deep Bowl, 7 inches in diameter, richly cut, $3.95.

Deep Bowl, 8 inches diameter, with extra fine cutting, $5.00.

Large Celery Tray $5.00.

One Bowl—very deep and 8 inches wide—fine deep cutting—reduced from $7.50 to $5.50.

Small piece chipped off so small that you'll have to look carefully to find it; makes two dollars difference in the price.

Six-inch Preserve Dish, with handles and deep cutting, $3.50.

A so Cream Set that will add a charm to your collection of cut glass, $10.80.

Miller & Rhoads

THIS IS A SEVEN TON PASSENGER

The Trip of "Jingo" from the Old World to the New.

A special from New York to the Baltimore Sun tells the following interesting story:

When the White Star liner George arrives in this port from Liverpool she will bring one unwilling passenger, who, at the time he took passage, made such strenuous objections to leaving his beloved England that every officer of the crew, from the captain to the lowest deck-hand, promised to give him a wide berth. As the passenger weighs nearly seven tons and is known to be rather obstreperous, the promise is likely to be kept to the letter.

The mammoth voyager is Mr. Jingo, the biggest elephant in captivity, recently purchased by Frank Bostock for his menagerie. The beast stands eleven feet four inches in his bare feet, two inches higher than the late Mr. Jumbo, who created admiration among the small boys until he came to an untimely end through trying to butt a Burman and Bailey circus car off the track.

Mr. Bostock bought the animal from the London Zoological Society for $100,000. The society didn't want to part with Mr. Jingo, as he is a great favorite in London, but as he was getting old, and as old elephants are likely to become troublesome, it was thought best to exchange him for American gold.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Barton Heights.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Baptist Church will meet at the residence of Mrs. Griffin in Brookland Park Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The Girls' Circle of the Baptist Church will meet at the home of Miss Mamie Coulter, of Brookland Park, Friday at half past 8 o'clock.

The Rev. L. C. Moore, pastor of the Barton Heights Methodist Church, has returned from Ashland, where he was called to officiate at the marriage of Mr. J. M. Cline and Miss Gertrude Crenshaw, of Alabama.

The next business meeting of the Epworth League will be held at the residence of Mrs. C. B. Cullen, of Lamb Avenue and Roberts Street, the second Tuesday in April.

Mr. E. D. Reid, who has been quite sick, is improving.

Mrs. W. G. Cosby has returned to her home from a visit to her sister in Hanover.

Mr. Kent has returned to Hanover from a visit to friends on the Heights.

Mrs. Burton has returned to her home from a brief visit to her aunt near the Seminary.

Mr. Tom Jones, of Luck Avenue, has left for Petersburg.

Mrs. Balle has returned to her home from a visit to her sister at her home in Brookland Park.

Miss Gertrude Jones, who has been visiting Miss Mary Jones, has returned to Manchester.

Mr. J. W. Polzey, who has been visiting his mother, has returned to Newport News.

Mr. G. B. Penseley, who has been traveling in West Virginia, has returned home.

Mr. Dodson has returned to Poconah, Va., after a visit to friends on the Heights.

Tea, which was given at Mrs. Yalball's on Chestnut Hill, proved to be quite a success. Misses Pettit and Miss Leahy recited and Misses Marshall and Sale sang duets. Misses Wingsfield and Cross played on the piano.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Wingsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Vaughan, Mrs. Sale, Mrs. Vawter, Mrs. Crump, Mrs. Grant, Misses Marshall, Bowman, Brooke, Dr. and Mrs. Walthall and Misses Dalby, Kirby, Reardon, Devine, Wingsfield and many others.

Mr. Bates, who has been quite sick, is able to be out.

Miss Blackwell, who has been quite sick at her home on Chestnut Hill, is able to be out.

The Rev. C. R. Kuyk, wife and family, have moved into their residence, corner Monticello Avenue and Yale Street.

Miss Grace Armstrong is quite sick. Mr. W. H. Bennett, of Ohio, is visiting his wife, of Brookland Park.

Miss Daisy Wright, of Old Church, Hanover county, who has been visiting friends in Brookland Park, has returned home.

Mr. Ray Dickerson has left for Washington.

Mr. Walter C. Crenshaw left yesterday on a business trip through the South.

Mr. Early Dean, of Newport News, is visiting Mr. and Mrs. M. F. Jones.

Miss Isabelle Garland, of Brookland, is visiting relatives on Marlon Hill.

Mr. Wynham Robertson, the chairman of the Democratic Committee of Washington county, is in the city on a visit.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island.

Mr. Jingo didn't like the idea of the journey a bit, and when preparations were made to transfer him he objected very strenuously. He refused to pack his trunk like a gentleman. Instead he loaded the trunk with water and blew it at the keeper.

The action of the society in selling Jingo was condemned by the public, and a wall went up from the newspapers. Several transfer companies absolutely refused to carry the ponderous animal to the White Star pier, and it was not until before a Jingo could be induced to put one of their flat cars at the disposal of Mr. Bostock. This, however, resulted from the fact that no one wanted to hazard their rolling stock.

Finally a company was found with a car strong enough to withstand the weight of the passenger, and he was shipped, still trumpeting and making a great fuss. It was then discovered that Mr. Jingo was too tall for the Liverpool tunnel, and it was necessary to force him into the indignity of kneeling in transit. This preyed upon the elephant's feelings to such an extent that when he was finally swung on board the liner he had to be chained to stanchions to keep him quiet.

Mr. Jingo's first voyage was made shortly after he fell into the hands of the Philistines in Africa. This was many years ago, but his elephantism never forgoes the internal sensations of the trip, and when he laid eyes on the George he refused to eat. Nothing could tempt his appetite until a lot of carrots were placed in his cage. Then he fell to and devoured enough to satisfy two ordinary members of his family. When the ship started, however, his eyes bulged out in fright, and he again determined to abstain from food.

On his arrival here a flat car will be run alongside the dock and much strong tackle will be used in hoisting Mr. Jingo and his crate on it. There will be many bales of hay in waiting, besides much grain, vegetables and other delicacies. A barrel of water will be provided each day to allay the thirst of the pachyderm, and he will be expected to get away with these, as well as seven bales of hay or vegetable bales, and a few bushels of vegetables.

The grain will be given in limited quantities until the elephant reaches his new home at Richmond, Va., where Mr. Bostock winters his animal family.

When the summer season opens Mr. Jingo will be transported to Coney Island